

Guidance Documents Introduction

Guidance documents provide examples of treatment alternatives common within the Field Office service area. These documents show the resource considerations and concerns being addressed, the practices needed to achieve a RMS level, and the effects of the practices on the resource concerns. Additional information about practice effects is available in Section V of the FOTG.

In Hawaii, ten guidance documents have been developed. They are used for information and training, and to support treatment alternatives that are developed with producers during the planning process.